Course Description

This course provides a graduate-level survey of the fundamental literature, concepts and controversies in contemporary International Relations. The course will begin to prepare students for comprehensive exams, but also introduce students to what is, for better or worse, a profession.

The amount of reading is, frankly, punishing. This syllabus represents a decision to sacrifice depth for breadth, and to train students in the essential professional task of efficient and effective critical reading. The assignments will require considerable additional reading.

Many weeks will include at least one review article. Inclusion of these articles is not designed as a substitute for reading original work, but rather as examples of excellent criticism. Students will demonstrate their understanding of this unique form of scholarship by writing their own review essays.

After an introduction, the course begins with in-depth study of three foundational books in the field. We will refer to these three books throughout the remainder of the course, which introduces additional work under loose weekly themes. Based on the interests of the class, the weekly readings and themes may change (with plenty of notice given). In the final week we will discuss what an IR research program (if such a thing exists) looks like.

Course Requirements

Reading and Participation (33%): Mastery of the reading demonstrated through constructive participation in seminar is essential.

In addition to participation, grades will be based on two written assignments. They are designed to help graduate students prepare for exams, master elements of IR as a profession, and lay out a path for future study that will hopefully culminate in a dissertation proposal.

Syllabus proposal (33%): Students will develop a syllabus on a focused topic in IR to be taught at either the undergraduate or graduate level. The syllabus should include a quarter's worth of readings, appropriate assignments, and a two-page summary for the professor on the logic underpinning these decisions.

Literature review (33%): Students will write an 8,000-word review article on a topic of their choosing. Grade will be based on both the analysis of the reviewed work but also the strength of the student's original argument within the review.

Students should meet with the professor within the first four weeks of the course to discuss the written assignments (topical overlap among the two is allowed, encouraged and may in fact be essential for one's sanity).

Readings

There are four required books for the class. They have been ordered and delivered to the Norris Bookstore.
